immunodeficiency virus-infected patients. In the United States the number of cases of HIV/AIDS is estimated to be two million with 10- to 20-fold rise in the number of patients with CD4 cell counts less than 100 cells/mm³ since 1986. These patients, who are at risk of developing lymphomas and intestinal malignancies, are most likely to benefit from immunomodulatory therapies. The extent to which immunosuppressants influence the course of HIV infection and the development of other malignancies is unclear. The authors reviewed the radiographic findings of 985 patients who were treated at the University of Pittsburgh between the years 1980 and 1993 and had a diagnosis of HIV-related bowel disease. In 535 patients with proven HIV infection, radiographs of the small and large bowel had been obtained within the past 1 year. Fifty-eight radiographs in 59% of these patients showed mucosal thickening in the colon and/or small bowel associated with focal or diffuse reactive lymphoid hyperplasia involving the deeper lamina propria of the affected bowel. The findings in 47 patients with histologically verified
