That being said, I can't help but wonder if all this talk about Photoshop is going to fuel the next Photoshop revolution. Given Adobe's dedication to a faster and better Photoshop, I can't help but hope that they stumble upon something big that completely changes the landscape of Photoshop, and helps spur a new revolution. We've been working on it for a long time, and Adobe's always been receptive to our ideas, but we're not the only one who's been working on this. There's a lot of other companies out there which are currently trying to define the future of Photoshop. These compete with Adobe in the same space, but they're all just trying to implement their experiences so cutting-edge design can happen faster. There's a huge difference between the desktop app that I personally use and the cloud apps that I've chosen to use in the past. Creative Cloud isn't just cost effective — it's also polished and very user-friendly. If you're at all interested, check out the competition. You might be pleasantly surprised. If you're looking for a free app, both Photoshop-lite and Red Giant's Post-Production Pro require users to pull down at least 2GB of local storage before they can start editing. However, there isn't really a reason for anyone to shell out any money for that privilege. It's amazing that we're still talking about Photoshop. There's just so much left to do, so much still left to reveal, and so many tweaks and refinements left to make. As a Photoshop customer myself, and a regular contributor to the Photoshop discussion forums, I'm completely spoiled if I'm honest. Photoshop is maybe the best overall software package in existence, and it's one of the best duties I've ever had. I don't care if it's just saved the lowly JPEG industry.
